Abstract

Regional population health is a key factor in achieving integration. Public health faces many challenges from chronic diseases, epidemics, and climate change. The aim of this special session is to serve as an international research forum for the presentation of new advances in the field of health geography. Topics of interest include, but not limited to: Health disparities, future health hazards due to climate change, challenges in health infrastructure and human capital, effects of socioeconomic factors on public health, and regional interventions for prevention.
